Red Rover.

Two centuries away have swept Above the hillocks where has slept. The body of a warrior brave Who never was to creeds a stave; As ever fought the pale face man. Beloved by brave papposes and squaw. Whose very word with them was law.

And where the white man finds a home Red Rover once did proudly roam; His hunting grounds were everywhere, He sought his game in field and air; And fearless lured from caves and rocks, The dreaded bear and craity fox. The wild woods with his war whoop rung. And scalps within his gridle hung.

Across the chasm of the past, A deep and sembre veil is cast, Red Rever's whose is silent now, The earth is resting on his brow; His tomahawk is buried low. No resurrection more to know; The winds forever sing his dirge, And by his grave the waters surge The very spot on which you stand,
Was once Red Rever's hunting land;
The waters which your earth shore kiss,
The fields and meadows once were his;
And where your horses proudly prance,
Red Rover held his battle dance;
The ground that trembles 'neath your to
Conceals Red Rover's buried dead.

Upon White River's waves of blue, Red Rover launched his birch canoe; Red Rover launched his birch cance; He bounded o'er its cryetal tide, With faithful warriors by his side; He brought from out the dashing spray, The finny tribs to light of day; He sported neath its waters clear, Without a lurking doubt or fear.

The dusky chief his wigwam pitched. He roamed the woods as wild and free, As warbling bird or busy bee; He knelt upon the virgin sod, Which white men had never trod, And praised with reverence deep imbued, The red man's god Monedo—good.

He studied nature as a book, He read her texts in vale and brook; The earth's bright green, the skies' dee Were all the bible that he knew; In howling atom, in grateful shower, In howling storm, in grateful show. In singing bird, in blooming flower, He saw Monedo everywhere— His spirit filled the earth and air.

The cricket's chirp, the lightning's flash. The answering thunder's awful crash. The meaning sea, the warbling rill. The lowly vale, the lofty hill. The tempest's roar, the ocean's roll, Were voices to the red man's soul; Of him, who from chaotic night, Awoke the slumbering earth to light.

Yes, where, pale faces, is he now? Oh, where the arrow and the bow, The tomahawk, the wigwam smoke The war whoop that the silence broke, Oh, where the forms of squaw and braves. And where the little pappose grave, Which sachem fondly loved to guard. Whose tender were so ill stared?

Alas their voices now are still,
And other forms their places fill;
The white man's wigwam marks the spot.
Where they were once, but now are not.
The war whoop is forever crushed,
And hate within their beaom crushed;
The war trail too, thank God, is lost,
Their harks on reacted attemms are too. Their barks on peaceful streams are tossed

Two hundred years have rushed along, White River sings the same old song. As when its banks Red Rover trod, At peace with man, at rest with Ged. And as it winds upon its way. From morn to eve, from eve to day, It kisses ever the green clad bed. Where rests in death Red Rover's head. From earth his soul has gained release, He smokes with all the pipe of peace; With pale face blends his work of love. Around the council fire above; No angry word, no bitter thought, Disturbs the quiet of their lot. Monedo's arms them both enfold, Their souls by love and right controlled.

Oh, blessed thought the land is nigh, Where the lamb shall with the Iion lis Where war and discord shall be dumb. And hate to christian love succumb, Where every human heart shall be Where heaven its kingdom shall begin And goodness triumph over sin.

Then what a gratifying sight, Will float before our visions bright; No dark revenge, no bitter feud, No fields of warfare to intrude; No weapons reaking with the blood of earth's united brotherhood;

May you, pale faces, work with me, The world from every wrong to free, That soon upon the heads of all The dews of heaven may sweetly fall; That every household may be blest With some immortal angel guest, Whose holy power each soul shall raise, To truer prayer and loftier praise.

Then when each beautiful canoe
Is launched upon heaven's seas of blue,
Your souls shall rise from things that tire
To good Monedo's council fire,
To greet the friends you love so well,
And with them ever more to dwell;
And among the bright and happy band,
To clasp Red Rover by the hand.
